

THE ARCADE OF THE GENERALIFE, SPAIN.

THE GENERALIFE, NEAR GRANADA.

THIS drawing is a view of the Arcade of the Generalife, a summer palace built by the Moors about a mile out of Granada. Its architecture is of a graceful character, and its present warm cream-like tint adds vastly to its charm—a charm ruined by the use of gold, red, and blue, as exemplified by the restorations now going on at the Alhambra. This palace is likewise remarkable for the most exquisite gardens which, by means of an ingenious irrigation, enjoy a perpetual summer. It is now, though the property of a noble family, in a state of decay and desertion. The accompanying illustration is from a drawing made for us on the spot.
